“ Max was a one-person dog, and I was his person. He was so beautiful that everywhere he went people were attracted to him and wanted to pet him. However, his protective instinct was very strong, and Max warned us of all dangers, both real and imagined! He was an indoor dog despite his size because his long hair was too beautiful to let it get dirty or matted. I miss the way he followed me everywhere in the house. I don't think he ever slept because no matter when I came home or what time I got up, he was there. Max loved to ride in the car. The last months of his life, we spent a lot of time riding in the car back and forth to Auburn University Veterinary Clinic. His last day I gave him Nutella and vanilla ice cream, and drove him around for two and a half hours. No other dog can replace him. His loss has made me sad, but at least I had eight years with him.
